Trends in Mental Health and Criminal Justice State Policy
About NAMI
NAMI, the National Alliance on Mental Illness, is the nation’s largest grassroots mental health organization dedicated to building better lives for the millions of Americans affected by mental illness.

Acknowledgements and Gratitude
This brief was prepared by NAMI’s state affairs team, Samira Schreiber, Stephanie Pasternak and Kathryn Gilley, with contributions from Shannon Scully, Jessica Tornabene and Hannah Wesolowski. NAMI is grateful to NAMI State Organization (NSO) executive directors and public policy leaders for providing information on their legislative priorities and accomplishments, which serve as the basis for this brief. We are also indebted to Matthew Camarda and NAMI New Jersey for providing insights into their advocacy strategy for the spotlight in this brief.

Additional thanks are extended to NAMI staff members who helped to edit (Anne Staab) and provide key facts and figures (Jessica Walthall), and to Pamela Krikorian, the designer of this brief. Finally, we deeply appreciate NAMI grassroots advocates who communicate with legislators to make mental health and criminal justice reforms a priority in state legislatures across the country.
People with mental illness are disproportionately represented in our nation’s criminal justice system. About two in five people who are incarcerated have a history of mental illness. This is twice the prevalence of mental illness within the overall population.

These numbers represent real people that our mental health system has failed. Fortunately, we know that diversion from the criminal justice system is possible, and NAMI believes that people with mental illness should be diverted at every possible opportunity and be connected to mental health care. One of the best tools for understanding how communities can divert individuals with mental health and substance use conditions away from criminal justice system involvement is the Sequential Intercept Model (often referred to as SIM).

1 About 40% of people incarcerated in state and federal prisons and 44% of people held in local jails have a history of mental illness.

---

SIM spans from Intercept 0, which refers to community services aimed at preventing any criminal justice system involvement, to key intercept points along the criminal justice system continuum, including:

- Intercept 0: Community Services
- Intercept 1: Law Enforcement
- Intercept 2: Initial Detention and Court Hearings
- Intercept 3: Jails and Courts
- Intercept 4: Reentry
- Intercept 5: Community Corrections

These concepts can also be applied to areas of state policymaking, which is the focus of this brief. NAMI 2023 State Legislation Issue Brief Series: Trends in Mental Health and Criminal Justice State Policy is intended to provide legislators with policy recommendations that support individuals with mental health conditions who are at risk of being or are justice system-involved. Recommendations are provided in five categories:

- Diversion
- Juvenile Justice
- Conditions in Custody
- Competency Restoration
- Civil Commitment

Each category includes a description of policymaking trends for that topic followed by highlighted legislation passed in the prior year and links to additional legislation. It is important to note the limited scope of this brief. NAMI strongly believes that the best solution for diverting individuals with mental illness away from criminal justice system involvement is through early intervention, comprehensive community mental health care and a robust crisis response system. NAMI wants everyone to be served at Intercept 0 (before they have any justice system contact); however, we must also offer solutions to those who are already justice-involved. Thus, policies aimed at the intersection of the mental health and criminal justice systems are the primary focus of this brief. NAMI will be covering state legislation that expands access to early intervention, community-based services and crisis care in future issue briefs later this year.
NAMI is grateful to the NAMI State Organization leaders and grassroots advocates who fought for these policy solutions and to the state legislators who championed these important reforms. We encourage all policymakers who are interested in the intersection of mental health and criminal justice to reach out to their NAMI State Organization leaders (look up your NAMI here) or reach out to NAMI National at mhpolicy@nami.org.

Methodology

The content of this issue brief is focused on mental health legislation that was enacted in 2023 (vetoed bills were not included). The research for this brief was conducted primarily using legislative tracking software (Quorum). Additionally, NAMI National collected NAMI State Organizations’ (NSOs) 2023 state legislative summaries (when available) to inform our analysis of major legislation and surveyed NSOs on their 2023 legislative activity.

Mental health policy spans many issues, all of which are important and worthy of policymakers’ attention. However, in the interest of creating an accessible and usable brief for advocates and other interested parties, the brief’s scope is specific to the intersection of criminal justice involvement and people with mental health conditions. This brief is not comprehensive; it is intended to provide highlights of state mental health legislation that intersect with the criminal justice system.

Even within these limits, more than 69 state mental health bills were collected for consideration in this brief. Upon further refinement, 33 bills were included in the final brief.
POLICY HIGHLIGHTS

Diversion

NAMI believes that people with mental illness should be diverted from justice system involvement at every possible opportunity. Diversion is a term used to describe informal and formal interventions that act as an “exit ramp” to move people away from involvement in the criminal justice system and that offer an alternative to address the underlying reason for someone becoming involved with the justice system.

In 2023, states made efforts to increase access to local programs that divert eligible individuals away from the criminal justice system and into the appropriate mental health services. Some highlights include New Jersey’s S 524, which created the Mental Health Diversion Program, and Texas’ SB 1677, which should be noted for directing local community mental health and justice system collaborations in rural areas.

POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS

To increase diversion opportunities, NAMI encourages states to:

- Provide funding for local community collaboration programs that bring mental health, emergency response, and criminal justice stakeholders to the table
- Invest in a variety of effective pre-booking and post-booking diversion programs

About 2 million times each year people with mental illnesses are booked into jails.

NAMI STATE ORGANIZATION SPOTLIGHT

NAMI New Jersey (NAMI NJ) prioritized the passage of S 524. According to NAMI NJ’s Advocacy & Public Policy Director, Matt Camarda, creating the Mental Health Diversion Program was important because “criminal justice mental health diversion efforts in New Jersey are fragmented, and options differ based on county.” Camarda shared that key actions to support the bill included:

- Bringing in the voices of a county prosecutor’s office to showcase their successful diversion program and graduates of that program;
- Sharing academic research that showed how programs reduce recidivism;
- Crafting advocacy messaging that everyone deserves the opportunity for recovery no matter where they live in the state; and
- Having a bill sponsor in leadership who was highly committed to the bill’s success.

NAMI NJ believes the bill is crucial to support more people with mental illness to engage in their recovery in the community, rather than in jail or prison.

Requires HHSC and Local Mental Health Authorities (LMHAs), if funding is available, to contract with nonprofit organizations to establish or expand regional behavioral health centers or jail diversion centers in the LMHA’s service area.

Juvenile justice encompasses practices and policies designed to serve nonadult offenders who are at risk of being justice involved or who are already involved in the criminal justice system. Youth are best served when they receive age-appropriate services, support and care through a multisystem approach that emphasizes opportunities for diversion and decriminalization. Trends in state legislation pertaining to juvenile justice include diverting youth to community-based alternatives in lieu of prosecution and incarceration, considerations of raising the minimum age for criminal prosecution for children, and increasing oversight for the juvenile justice system.

The use of community-based alternatives involves the cross-collaborative efforts of various agencies that work together to provide youth services that support rehabilitation and reduce further justice system involvement. One state that passed juvenile justice legislation was South Dakota (SB 6). This bill authorizes community response teams to recommend alternative community-based interventions and rehabilitative resources to the court on behalf of the juvenile prior to adjudication.

To reduce incarceration and recidivism for youth, NAMI encourages states to:

- Invest in community-based alternatives to incarceration including but not limited to mental health services offered to affected youth and family
- Use current adolescent brain science to inform minimum age of criminal prosecution for youth and youth sentencing standards
- Increase accountability for the conditions of juvenile correctional facilities with independent oversight authority

Summary
An act that increases protection for youth in county juvenile detention centers by expanding the oversight powers of the existing Office of Independent Juvenile Ombudsman to include county juvenile detention centers. With the expanded oversight, it allows youth in county detention centers to access an independent office to request assistance, obtain information, communicate confidentially, or seek relief.

Despite the overrepresentation of incarcerated people with mental illness, the conditions in prisons and jails are often far from rehabilitative. Harmful practices like forceful restraint, solitary confinement, inadequate access to medication and treatment, and limited visitation with loved ones can worsen an individual’s mental health and negatively affect their path to recovery and reentry. Public policies aimed at ensuring incarcerated individuals have adequate access to treatment and programming, personal development, and appropriate reentry options can have a major impact on individuals’ mental health and success returning to their communities post-incarceration.

In 2023, states moved toward minimum standards on restraint and seclusion practices and tailored incarceration and discharge plans for people with mental illness.

To strengthen rehabilitation for individuals who are incarcerated, NAMI encourages states to:

- Eliminate the use of solitary confinement and restrict the use of seclusion and restraint practices for individuals with mental health conditions

- Strengthen discharge/reentry planning to prioritize individuals’ mental health needs, including ensuring individuals reentering the community have an adequate supply of any needed psychiatric medications and an appointment to see a community-based mental health provider, as appropriate

An act that requires the Department of Corrections (DOC) to study and make recommendations on the cost benefits of constructing, repairing, or merging and consolidating jail facilities, and alternatives to incarceration for people with mental illnesses. Strengthens existing law to require county human services to complete a discharge plan with people who 1) have a serious and persistent mental illness and 2) have been sentenced to jail for three or more months.

For more examples of 2023 conditions in custody legislation, see Appendix C.
When a person faces criminal charges, they have a right to a fair trial, including being competent to stand trial, which means they are able to understand the charges against them and contribute to their defense. Many states’ competency restoration systems are overwhelmed and face significant backlogs due to limited mental health resources. This means that some defendants can wait weeks or months in jail for assessment and restoration services to become available.

Competency restoration services are designed to prepare someone to participate in a court proceeding; these services do not focus on treating underlying mental illnesses. However, to avoid unnecessary incarcerations, NAMI believes that states should leverage community-based competency restoration or diversion programs for people deemed incompetent to stand trial and prioritize connection to appropriate mental health care.

In 2023, Washington and Colorado made significant efforts to connect individuals to treatment and focus on long-term recovery.

- Invest in community mental health infrastructure to support community-based competency restoration
- Create pathways to care for those deemed incompetent to stand trial
- Establish standards of competency restoration that support long-term recovery

Summary
An act that improves the competency restoration process by adding new clinical intervention specialists to help ensure time spent in jail contributes to the process of recovery. The act creates new diversion programs, new admission flexibility, and shorter stays for certain cases, and adds a requirement for courts to find “genuine doubt” over competency before ordering restoration services.

Over the last several legislative sessions, state policy leaders have continued to grapple with approaches to reforming state systems for civil commitment. Policy discussions continue to balance how to connect those with the greatest need to necessary care, while protecting the rights of people with mental illness and avoiding past mistakes of institutionalization. Driven by the stories of families, NAMI works to ensure that changes in civil commitment laws do not expand the role of the court system and involuntary treatment beyond what is necessary.

This past legislative session, states continued to revise definitions of eligibility for civil commitment to go beyond the traditional standards of “dangerousness” and focus on clinical need (Indiana HB 1006 and Texas SB 1624). States also took steps to improve the transition between institutional commitment and community-based care and to ensure people do not remain in involuntary care beyond what is clinically necessary (Virginia SB 1299/HB 1976). It is also important to note the changes happening in California (SB 35) and the implementation of the CARES Court program. While its overall impact has yet to be seen, it is a significant policy change in terms of establishing the court’s role to engage people with complex mental health needs.

CONCLUSION

People with mental illness deserve care, not incarceration. Yet we continue to see the criminalization of mental illness that perpetuates the overrepresentation of people with mental illness in our criminal justice system. Policymakers have the opportunity to change this. Policies should prioritize diverting people with mental health conditions to treatment and services at every opportunity — before arrest, after arrest and at all points within the justice system. For those who are justice-involved, states should prioritize efforts to connect individuals with mental health conditions to care that supports recovery during and after incarceration.
